A Narrative of Everyday Affairs

: Their Married Life ::

Helen Plays the Part of Comforter With a Happy Feeling of Usefulness.

She had thought she would walk to the subway station, but she hadn't gone far when a shee began to hurf, and she decided to take a taxi. It couldn't be more than 70 cents over to the subway and it was worth it. Helen sank into the back seat and sighed.

On second thought she winced at the extravagance of a taxi, and resolved to make up far it by suggesting that Warren take a few dollars off her monthly allowance. As it was she just managed to scraps through nicely, with once in a while a little over to put in the bank. Once she saved up and had bought a French clock she had wanted for agen. Warren had commended her when she told him that it had been bought out of the money he had given bec. She hated to it with any leas, but perhaps, she thought to herself. Warren would refuse to accept such a piece of self sacrifies; she hoped so.

Heins stretched out on the bed in her room and closed her eyes drowslip. Then the bell rang.

"Didn't yeu know I was lying down. Nora: Why didn't you tell whoever it was that i was out."

that's all, and the heat."

Louise in Treable.

Louise came to the door of the living room and smiled at Heisn a pitcoun little smile, Helen thought, and she went forward impulsively, and put her arms around the tailer woman.

Louise suddenly began to cry, and listen genuinely alarmed, southed her gently and led the way into the living room.

"Of course not, but what is jet"
"Bub and I quarreled." The words came hallingly. "We were so foolish.

Hallen, in spite of herself, heaved too; but he phoned today and I thought around the apartment and scalized that her mother had gone, she was conscience stricken the near injuste, and scolded herself furiously for allowing such a thought to enter her mind; but the thought was there just the same.

There was a new excitement in the thought that she would be alone when Warren came home from business that svening, that saything she might say would not have to be said ebfore a third party; that even if Warren came home out of temper and scolded, she would not have the added humiliation of having her mother overhear it aff.

Sees Her Mother Leave.

She had just seen her mother off on the train. The Pennsylvania station had been close and crowded. Helen the hot weather coming made her cross. She had answered her mother absentinindedly when she had said that they would expect Helen to come out all right. Parhaps they had both been out of sorts, and no doubt Bob was as softy as she was she had said that they would expect Helen to come out all right. Parhaps they had both been out of sorts, and no doubt Bob was as softy as she was she had said that they would expect Helen to come out all right. on everything that comes to the attention of the police.

"Every officer will be required to report the cases that come to his attention and the circumstances mirrounding them," said chief Johnson. Thus, when the night force goes off the day force can proceed with a full knowledge of the details, and carry on the work, if turther action is messeary. Each officer will know what the other is doing, thus avoiding much confusion. Each officer will also be required to report every so often so that the station will know at all times what is going on on the various beats."
